

About “A Brief History of Time”:

Stephen Hawking is the theoretical physicist whose theories about space, time and black holes have formed the way we now think about the universe. His brilliance takes on a poignancy because his mind occupies a body which has been wasting away for years with ALS, a disease that has left him incapable of speech or movement - except of a few fingers with which he uses a computer to communicate with the world. His voice, heard throughout the film, is synthesized. It was Hawking’s intuition and wicked sense of humor that came to symbolize the unbounded possibilities of the human mind.
